The importance of recruiting participants from diverse cultural backgrounds into research studies has been well recognized, but the literature suggests that such recruitment remains a challenge for health professionals. This paper is a report of the findings of a project that examined the acceptability of using a new conceptual framework to structure recruitment of community-based health workers in research. The framework, "Dialectic frames of action and understanding," was developed using a philosophical framework. Interviews were conducted with a purposeful sample of 24 health professionals who were interested in health d4474df7b8
