In an effort to remain in check this season, the Indianapolis Colts' defense has once again developed a plan to frustrate and confuse their opponents. The Colts' blueprint for Week 1 was to put a major emphasis on the run, following the lead of head coach Chuck Pagano and general manager Ryan Grigson. The Colts' plan for Week 1 was working well until the Los Angeles Chargers ended the game on a final drive that included some brilliant play by quarterback Philip Rivers. On the game-winning drive, Rivers finished with a 22-of-33 passing performance, and he was helped by a pair of blown coverages on third down, both of which contributed to the Chargers' final score. The Colts' defense is going to play a similar style in Week 2, as their opponents, the Tennessee Titans, are a running team. While quarterback Marcus Mariota is the Titans' passing leader, he's far from the only threat. Leonard Fournette leads the team in rushing with 843 yards and 12 touchdowns. Along with Fournette, DeMarco Murray, Derrick Henry and Dion Lewis all play a role in the Titans' running game, and the Colts defense have to keep them in check, just as they did in Week 1. If the Colts defense is to remain the team to beat in the AFC South and beyond this season, they'll need to force multiple turnovers to help ease the onus of Andrew Luck's back injury. Here's how the Colts' defense can continue to 2d92ce491b
