It's completely free, but you'll need a valid license to be able to use it. The present invention relates to the electrostatic charging of photoresponsive surfaces, and more particularly to the electrostatic charging of a photoreceptor surface having a top surface coated with a photoconductive organic coating. In electrophotography, an electrostatic image is formed on the surface of a photoconductive member such as a selenium layer by uniformly charging the surface thereof. Thereafter, the surface of the photoconductive member is exposed to a light image of an original document to be reproduced to selectively discharge the charged areas of the photoconductive member to record the original image thereon. The electrostatic latent image is developed by contacting it with a finely divided electrostatically attractable powder referred to as "toner". The toner image is thereafter transferred to a substrate, such as a sheet of paper, and the image is fixed to the substrate by a fusing device such as a heated roll or pressure roll. In electrophotographic imaging apparatus, it is desirable to maintain the surface of the photoconductive member at a substantially uniform electrostatic charge. As a general rule, the photoconductive member is subjected to a flow of direct current (DC) electric charge having a polarity opposite that of the charge desired for the developed image. Accordingly, the developing powder, which is electrostatically attracted to the charged surface areas, is attracted to the surface areas having a charge of the opposite polarity. In the development of electrostatic images, the amount of toner attracted to the surface areas of the photoconductive member is related to the magnitude of the charge on the surface of the photoconductive member, and thus the quality of the resultant image. Electrophotographic imaging apparatus, such as copiers and duplicators, and more recently facsimile machines and electrostatic printing devices, have been successfully constructed using an electrophotographic process in which the charge on the surface of the photoconductive member is controlled. The controlling of the charge is achieved in such apparatus by controlling the exposure of the photoconductive member to a light image of an original document, as described above. By successively controlling the charging of the surface of the photoconductive member, the surface potential of the member is maintained at a substantially constant value. The toner is then electrostatically attracted to the charged areas of the photoconductive member in proportion to the magnitude of the surface potential. Accordingly, an electrostatic latent image is formed in the charged areas, the image being made visible by developing the latent image with toner. The toner is subsequently transferred to a substrate, such as paper, where it is
