An on-line protein digestion and isotope labeling technique has been developed for the quantification of proteins in complex samples. This technique combines the digestion of proteins by thermolysin with their separation by a reverse-phase high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC) column. After digestion the peptides remain associated with the column and are eluted into a nitrogen-flushed flow-cell where they are trapped in the presence of heavy water and separated from the digest mixture. The trapped peptides are then released into the gas phase and analyzed using a thermal conductivity detector (TCD). We have performed in vitro experiments with a range of proteins spiked into various samples. The protein recovery ranged from approximately 97% for hen egg white lysozyme, which has a relatively low isoelectric point, to approximately 75% for lysozyme from carp (Calanus finmarchicus) (pI approximately 6.8) and bovine plasma albumin (pI approximately 5). A number of confounding factors were investigated and found to contribute to the observed losses. These included differences in the amounts of carbon dioxide initially present in the digest and failure of the TCD to detect peptides when the TCD background was high. The performance of the method was validated by spiking lysozyme into tryptic peptide mass spectrometry standard solutions, which indicated that a limit of detection of 10ng of lysozyme
