The nature of these cells will be determined by studying their structural and biochemical properties as well as their electrical and optical characteristics. The morphology of these cells, both in situ and following different physiological and pharmacological treatments, will be studied by standard light, electron, and scanning electron microscopy. In addition to electron microscopy the cytochemical demonstration of specific enzymes and the immunofluorescent localization of specific antisera will be used. The functional activity of these cells will be studied with the intracellular recording technique. Preliminary experiments indicate that this cell plays a role in the control of eye movement. The chemical nature of the conduction system of these cells will be studied with a combination of transmission and scanning electron microscopy and histochemical techniques. The physiological role of this cell will be determined by injecting physiologically characterized ganglion cells into the perilymph space of the eye.
